

I strongly oppose the stretching of the educational exception to copyright rules that schools and universities have appropriated. Making a few copies of a page or two is one thing; stealing whole chapters, papers or books and binding them up in "course materials" and selling them to students is quite another. Access Copyright tells me to expect a 55 percent decrease in my modest royalties next year because of this government-approved theft of intellectual property.